High interest rates of banks

2962. DR. GOPALRAO VITHALRAO PATIL: Will the Minister of FINANCE be pleased to state:

(a) the cause of high interest rates of banks in the coutnry when compared to banks in other countries both developed and developing;

(b) how this factor is affecting our development efforts and export promotion thrust;

(c) how many branches of nationalised banks are being closed because of ineffeciency and mismanagement;

(d) whether overstanding non-feasible opening of new branches is one of the important cause of high interest rates; and

(e) how the interest rates are determined and by whom?

THE MINISTER OF FINANCE (SHRI P. CHIDAMBARAM): (a), (b), (d) and (e) The interest rates on bank deposits are determined by Reserve Bank of India (RBI) taking into account various factors including rate of inflation, the pace of monetary expansion, the relative attractiveness of other saving instruments and the viability and profitability of banks. Lending rates are related to deposit rates in the sense that adequate spread between the deposit and lending trates is required in order to maintain the viability of banks.

Any inter-country comparision of interest rates needs to take into account, inter alia, the inflation rate and relative external value of currencies concerned. Interest rates have to be adjusted for inflation and exchange rate differential. In the developed economies, interest rates are largely market determined.

The present interest rate structure for scheduled commercial banks is given in the Statement (see below). The banks determine actual lending rates (above Rs. 2 lakh) through stipulation of a prime lending rate (PLR). Banks determine their PLR on the basis of post of funds and expected return on their deployment. Individual borrowers are charged different rates according to their rating by the banks. The rates are however, under continued review and modification is made theirin on the basis of emerging developments in the economy.

As regards export credit, interest rates on a large part of export (Rupee) credit is at lower rate of 13 per cent (Pre-shipment credit upto 180 days and Post-shipment credit upto 90 days), while the PLR of major banks are in the region of 15.5 per cent to 16.0 per cent.

For having a strong and substantial growth of export, the objective of policy has been to ensure timely and adequate credit to the export sector and to ensure that no worthwhile export order suffer for want of bank finance. Banks are also provided with export credit re-fiance by the RBI to encourage them to expand their credit to the export sector.

(c) RBI has reported that as per extant policy, commercial banks have been allowed to swap/close their un-remunerative branches at semi-urban urban and metropolitan centres. However, RBI have not allowed banks to close their rural branches at centres served by a single branch of a commercial bank (excluding branches of RRBs). At rural centres which have two or more commerial bank branches which are incurring losses, RBI have advised that they may close if necessary, one of the branches by mutual consultation and with the prior concurrence of the concerned State Government and RBI. However, no bank has approach RBI to close a rural branch under this procedure.

RBI have further reported that they have allowed commercial banks to convent unviable branches into satellite offices, keeping in view the cost benefit aspect, the likely inconvenience to the existing clientele, the effect of such conversion on their performance in the preparation of District Credit Plan and Priority, Sector Lending.
